

HOW MUCH OF YOU IS REALLY YOU?

Rationale

This artwork explores the struggle between who we truly are and who we are expected to be. Inspired by Carl Jung’s concept of Persona and the Shadow, it asks a simple yet profound question: Are we in control of our identity, or are we shaped by unseen forces?

The face made of chaotic lines represents a fragmented self—disjointed, uncertain, and influenced by external pressures. Above it, puppet hands pull the strings, symbolizing how society, expectations, and even our own fears manipulate us. The thin strings suggest an illusion of control—are we making our own choices, or simply reacting to what’s expected?

The phrase "How much of you is really you?" is placed at the bottom, almost as a whisper to the viewer, urging reflection. The clean typography contrasts with the chaotic image, highlighting the tension between order and the hidden complexity of identity.

This piece is about self-awareness. It challenges us to pause and ask: Are we living authentically, or are we just performing a role? The answer may not be simple, but recognizing the strings is the first step to cutting them.
